House should have open hallways for speakership

Political Opinion

As the House of Representatives prepares to begin its session, it is time to consider the need for open hallways for speakership. The House has a long history of being a place where members can speak their minds and be heard. It is a place where they can debate the issues of the day and make decisions that will affect the lives of millions of Americans. But in recent years, the House has become more and more of a place where members are silenced and their voices are not heard. This is a problem that needs to be fixed, and the House should have open hallways for speakership.

This collage features a variety of technical illustrations. At the top left, there's a drawing of a mechanical component with a circular base and a central shaft. To its right is a schematic diagram showing a network of lines and nodes, possibly representing an electrical or fluidic system. Below these, on the left, is a detailed cross-section of a mechanical part, showing internal features like a central bore and various internal surfaces. To the right of this is another schematic, similar to the one at the top right but with different configurations. Further down on the left is a drawing of a mechanical assembly, possibly a pump or a motor, with a complex housing and internal components. To its right is a structural diagram showing a frame or support system with various joints and connections.
